Notes: Calculated from the raw data presented in the text of this publication.

This includes all presidential and national legislative elections after the date of independence or 1959, whichever occurs first. Indirect elections and upper house or regional assembly legislative elections are excluded. When an election has more than one round, only the second round is counted. Generally, referenda are excluded except if it is a vote on a further term or continuation in office for a president. If a coup occurs the next day, the election is counted; however, if a coup or intervention occurs during an election and an election is not completed, then it is not counted. An election is counted despite fraud, manipulation, massive abstentions or boycotts by the opposition. When only unopposed party candidates are nominated and no polling takes place, then it is not an election. By-elections and make-up elections due to fraud or violence are not counted as separate elections. When official results are reported despite voting having been annulled in some constituencies, the partial results are used. However, if voting occurs and is annulled in all constituencies, then the election is not counted.
